Home Enterprise.

The gross and disgusting inconsistency of ome people, cannot be animadverted upon with too much severity. They affect to be warmly devoted to home interests; they are pregnant with plausible theories; they converse flippantly about revolutionizing our system of agriculture, and making gigantic strides in the mechanic arts; they talk eloquently about the commanding importance of establishing schools of high character, and building up first class public journals; but their practice is incompatible with their teaching. They embellish these topics with they advocate, they luxuriate in extravagant description, and burn in the fervid fires of high wrought enthusiasm. But their actions contradict their florid speeches, and prove them to be nothing but rhapsodies of words. The persons we allude to, esteem nothing meritorious, unless it ripen beneath distant skies.
